The Beginning Has Just Begun

After nine years of being in a catholic school the special day was finally here. The day was about to end, it was approximately 5:40 p.m., I was in a rush to get to school that I didn't stop to think about what was about to happen. When I got into the car so we can leave, I had enough time to think about what had just happened. I was graduating, nine years in the same school have just gone by. I thought that this day would arrive a lot later, but it arrived a lot sooner than expected. The whole car ride, I couldn't stop thinking about my school family. All our memories together are just gone, all our days together gone. I finally made it to school and I opened the door, I walked to my classroom (because we were supposed to wait there until the ceremony) I saw my fellow classmates and seeing them made me sad. It was my last day seeing them and we've been through everything together.

As we were walking to church, we all started to get excited (everyone was yelling, hands were in the air and some people were jumping). I was excited but nervous, I had begun to realize again that this is the big day. It was finally time to walk down that runway and when the music began, everyone's mood had changed. I started to walk down the runway and seeing the flashing lights and parents' smiles, was just amazing. I started to smile and started to feel happy, I made my parents proud and nothing can top that day. I sat down and the ceremony went on.

As the ceremony was coming to an end, I looked at my friends and I knew that after all I've been through with them, I was ready for the next chapter of my life. The ceremony came to an end and we all left the building. When we were outside, everyone started to hug and took pictures with each other. I took pictures with all of my friends and my family. I thanked my friends for an amazing time. Now, I start a new chapter of my life with new people.
